

THREE SINGERS NEW HERE.

THEY HAVE COME TO SECURE NEW YORK'S APPROVAL.

Maligone, Ceppi, and Maria Bellina have come to the Metropolitan Opera House to secure New York's approval. The three singers at the Metropolitan Opera House this season have not yet been heard, and they have come to this country with their reputations still to be made. The stage experience of every one of them has been very brief, although report from the cities in which they have hitherto appeared credits them with successful and promising achievement. Some of them, however, bring a great reputation to this country, but every one of the three is anxious for the endorsement of this country. It may be regarded as rather a flattering deference to our opinion that foreign singers have begun to regard highly the seal of approval which New York audiences will put on them. It would be unnecessarily anxious to inquire if they were anxious to find success here, because success at the Metropolitan means something like permanence in the opera house.

which is the ambition now of most European singers to reach. Whatever their reasons may be, Maria Bellina and Mr. Thomas Saligno and Ernesto Ceppi are quite frank that they have come to this country to get the endorsement of New York approval. It goes without saying, however, that unless they had already shown some promise of success in the effort, Maurice Grau would not have been likely to have given this opportunity.

Mr. Maria Bellina has already one distinction which is probably shared by no other prima donna that ever sang here before. She was born in Siberia, near the European frontier. Her parents were Russians, and they moved to Odessa. Mr. Bellina married there, and later decided to begin seriously her preparation for the operatic stage. She went to Paris—went with her husband, however—and studied singing with Mme. Viardot-Garcia. Two years ago she made her debut at the Theatre de la Monnaie at Brussels in an opera called "L'Enfance de Roland," and sang during her first season there such roles as "L'Enfance de Roland" and "Marguerite in Faust." She continued to sing in Brussels, with occasional appearances at Nice and Monte Carlo, until Mr. Grau engaged her for the Metropolitan. She will make her debut on Monday night at the Metropolitan in "L'Enfance de Roland." She is willing to sing such modest roles here in order to take the approval of New York audiences back with her when she goes to sing in opera for the first time in her own country. She is a small woman of very attractive appearance, and very much younger looking than her photograph makes her out to be. The picture is from the atelier of Mme. Dupont.

Thomas Saligno is a young Frenchman who has sung for two years at the Opera Comique in Paris. He created the tenor role in Saint-Saëns' opera, "Phryne," and the picture shows him in the part. He is 28 years old, and a native of Marseilles. Before he decided that he was a voice he used to be a violinist in the opera house there. He was discovered there by a tenor, the young man put down the fiddle and the bow and went up to Paris. He won a first prize at the Conservatoire, and made his debut at the Opera Comique three years ago. After that he sang there for five seasons, a call to Helms gave him the opportunity that he had been seeking. The reputation of Helms gave him the opportunity to appear in the heavier roles, so he went to Helms and appeared for one season as Ernest and Ernest, among other parts. He will make his debut here with Mme. Ceppi. On Friday morning he sang in the Opera House for the first time, and with a piano gave several numbers from "L'Enfance de Roland." Several of the critics heard him and he was well received in particular enthusiastic over his singing. "He could tell that the man had been a musician," he said. "Before he sang he was a musician." Mr. Planchon is always a generous and kindly critic of the young artists in the company.

Muscle has been more or less conspicuous in some of the musicians of New York has heard this winter. Martinus Sieking, the pianist, a pupil of Mendelssohn as well as of other masters more directly concerned with the art which Sieking practices, has been a long time in the city.
